HE president then suggested their all retiring early, as they-L would have to be up before daybreak the next morning, and accordingly, after the necessary orders had been given to the servants, they turned in to bed. An hour before daybreak the next morning the president roused up the others of the party, and, while they were dressing, he ordered the servants to bring the chota hazree (small breakfast), taking this precaution in case of being out longer than they expected. By the time the small breakfast was over the day had well broken, and the elephant and horses being ready, they all started for Putwut, where they found the Sulkhun shikari and a good number of beaters waiting for them. Leaving directions for the animals to wait their return at Putwut, the party set out under the guidance of the shikari, and were well satisfied with their success, two sambhur, one spotted deer, three hares, and two peacocks being their mornings work. Getting tired at last, one of the villagers was sent off with orders for the elephant and horses to be brought along the road to a certain point which they would make for. The last deer that was shot having been slung, they took the nearest way for the road, where they found the animals waiting, and giving orders for the shikari and beaters to come along, they mounted and soon returned to the tents...
